Not illustrated. 1824 Excerpt: ...not being deemed sufficiently explicit, Lord Surrey moved another address, assuring his Majesty that all delays in a matter of this moment have an inevitable tendency to weaken the authority of his government, and most humbly entreating his Majesty that he will take such measures towards this object as may quiet the anxiety and apprehension of his faithful subjects. Mr. Pitt, however, declaring that he had resigned his office of chancellor of the exchequer, and that any resolution or address relative to a new arrangement of administration was unnecessary, Lord Surrey consented to withdraw his motion. In consequence of this resignation, the Duke of Portland was placed at the head of the treasury; Lord John Cavendish was re-appointed chancellor of the exchequer; Lord North and Mr. Fox were nominated joint secretaries of state, the first for the home, the latter for the foreign department; Lord Koppel, who had recently resigned on account of his disapprobation of the peace, was again placed at the head of the admiralty; Lord Stormont was created president of the council; Lord Carlisle was advanced to the post of lord privy-seal; the great seal was put into commission, the Chief Justice Loughborough, so distinguished for political versatility, who could change and change and yet go on, being declared first lord commissioner; the Earl of Northington was appointed to the government of Ireland; Viscount Townshend was made master-general of the ordnance; Lord Sandwich ranger of the parks; and Mr. Burke reinstated in his former post of paymaster of the forces. Of the seven cabinet ministers, the majority were of the old whig or Rockingham party, and occupied the most important posts; Lords Stormont, North, and Carlisle, contenting themselves ratherwitl...
